Lightroom 5 brings a new and improved UI to the table along with a full catalog of new, amazing Speed Boost features that make taking, selecting, and sharing your images even easier. In addition to the changes in the user interface itself, Lightroom 5's speed and workflows have been optimized to provide a faster and more responsive workflow. That's right, I said faster. As one of the most important features of any photo tool, image editing speed is something that has been updated in Lightroom 5. This isn't just with the Speed Boost features, but the RAW conversion as well due to its processing improvements. Lightroom has always been able to reduce RAW file size, but now you can do collections, adjustments, and pans, and preview them for a fast and easy workflow. There were no changes in the actual imaging engine, meaning you can always expect the same excellent performance as usual. With the release of Photoshop and Lightroom 5, Adobe is taking control of its software and making it open source. Now, there are over 500 people contributing code and features to the open source community. Along with the expected improvements, it makes the company more flexible and able to work with more partners. An aspect of Lightroom 5 I have not got to know yet is the architectural change that has gone into the program, but they have written about it already and I intend to have a closer look at it later this year. It seems that the team responsible has made a high priority of creating the program to ensure it is up to Photoshop standards in terms of stability, performance, and even memory.
